In most cases, the surfaces are oxidized (porous or noble metals) and the devices are used for electronic or catalytic devices. Owing to the enhancement of the quantum efficiency, GELNRs produced by a pump alone and/or using chemical reactions for the creation of GELNRs [Zhu2018] show higher efficiency than their pores counterparts. However, the GELNRs are mostly produced by a pump in conjunction with a chemical reaction [miles2018multiple; @Kim2017; @wang2019multilayer; @Walter2013], which means they are porous. In summary, we have shown that the CL intensity emitted by GELNRs is strongly enhanced for a broad range of pump fluences. This enhancement originates from the interactions of pheophores with the neighboring particles. This work may pave the way for the synthesis of porous, new, pheophore-based CL materials in the future.
